

} A fixed navigation bar with large text will make it easier to select different pages.

} Text will no longer contain bold or underlined text. This gets rid of confusion over whether there are links here (which there aren't).

} Images will be organized in a grid format, have clear contrast with the background, and will not merge into each other. This eliminates the disorientation and poor layout of the original site.

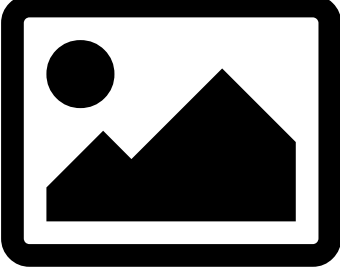

} Information for "locations" is now presented as its own section. This makes the images and texts easier to read. This also increases efficiency as going into the locations page is optional, not required.

For tablet and mobile, the navigation bar remains easy to view via resizing. When the bar is opened, the text will appear large and legible.

Images will now wrap as needed to fit the page. They will be evenly spaced out, making it easy to view each image without the need for horizontal scrolling.

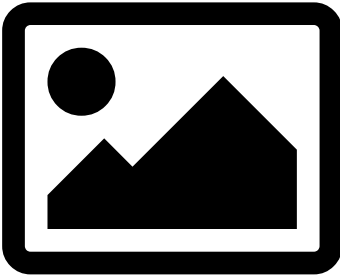

Similarly, the information for locations is now organized to accommodate smaller screens. The images themselves will change size according to the user's screen dimensions.

The bottom navigation bar from the original site no longer exists. Instead, I have created a footer that contains links to social media and email, which some users may find helpful.

General Annotations:

Once again, the navigation bar is minimized and interactive for the user to open. It is poor design to force all headings to remain on the navbar.

Similar to the resizing for tablets, the phone screen resolution will determine how the text and images are displayed on the screen.
